

Las Vegas HPHC: Zen Curry Cup Super Smash Bros Gaming Tournament

The Super Smash Bros gaming tournament is called the Zen Curry Cup, named after the restaurant that my dad manages called Zen Curry Express. He also sees the potential of this event and has helped me a lot throughout the couple of tournaments I have run.

So far I have hosted 3 tournaments and I am hosting another one this upcoming Sunday after church. We have them at my house but recently so many of our youth have been attending that it has become a bit crowded. We started out with 11 people attending the tournament to 16 in the latest tournament.

Here is the best part, not only were people coming to play in the tournament, but there were a good handful of people attending just to play board games or hang out. I believe this is where the potential of Zen Curry Cup shines.

We can potentially invite anybody who likes to play board games, sports, or come just to hang out with other youth/young adults. This can bring the divided groups of youth and young adults together in one place and break the ice between a lot of different types of people who don't usually have time or the opportunity to meet. I actually like your effort in bringing together two random people from church with coffee and I think Zen Curry Cup can achieve that goal in a similar way.
