Part 2 of interview with an expert: Freedom of Religion is for the Minorities – Confinement Victims to Gain International Recognition

International Human Rights Lawyer Patricia Duval

by the Religious Freedom Investigative Team of the editorial department of Sekai Nippo

See part 1 of the interview

Q: Before and during World War II, the Japanese government carried out religious persecution. After the war, the Japanese Constitution enshrined freedom of religion. Now, 80 years later, the case of the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification (formerly the Unification Church) has become an opportunity for the entire nation to reflect on religious freedom as a fundamental human right. However, the government's request for a dissolution order and the parallel legislative moves, such as the Special Law for Victims of Certain Illegal Acts, have raised concerns about various human rights violations against ordinary Family Federation members.

Duval: The government is facilitating a system where believers' families are encouraged to lodge complaints, leading to the suppression of a religious organization. This is an extremely dangerous mechanism and must not be tolerated. Domestically, it violates the freedom of religion guaranteed by the Constitution. Internationally, it seriously infringes on the freedom of religion protected under international human rights treaties, making the government's responsibility grave.

Q: In Japan's legal system, freedom of religion is restricted by the concept of "public welfare", which contrasts with the perspective of international law.

From header of the webpage of the Human Rights Committee, a subpage on the site of the UN Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner Duval: The UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) has, for over 15 years, consistently recommended that the Japanese government refrain from restricting freedom of religion based on the ambiguous concept of "public welfare". This concept is legally vague and can be applied in an unlimited and arbitrary manner.

As an expert in international human rights law, I must emphasize that the core spirit of religious freedom is the protection of religious minorities' faiths. In democratic states, freedom of religion is rarely discussed in the context of majority religions. The role of the government should be neutral, ensuring that neither the majority nor the minority is favored.

However, the request for the dissolution of the Family Federation by the Ministry of Education (MEXT) contradicts this principle. Under the guise of public welfare, it seeks to eradicate a religious minority. Furthermore, the government's stance aligns with the majority rather than remaining neutral. These two points make it a violation of international human rights law.

Q: Speaking of human rights violations, over the past 60 years, as many as 4,300 Family Federation believers have been subjected to abduction, confinement, and coercive faith-breaking.

Duval: These victims were physically restrained through violent means, forcibly restrained through violent means, forcibly detained, and deprived of all freedoms until they renounced their faith. This ongoing practice has been called “the worst human rights violation in postwar Japan”. The most extreme case involved Toru Goto, who was confined for 12 years and 5 months. Recently, Asahi Shimbun (31st January 2025) reported that a court ruled his relatives’ actions illegal and ordered them to pay 22 million yen in damages.

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

Article 18(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) guarantees that individuals have the right not to be forcibly deprived of their religious freedom. It is outrageous that the Japanese government has neglected this issue for nearly 60 years, allowing 4,300 cases of abduction and forced renunciation to persist.

In 2014, the UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) presented concrete evidence and urged the Japanese government to take effective measures to protect this right. I vividly remember that a few months later, the Tokyo High Court finally handed down a ruling in favor of Goto, increasing his compensation in its verdict.

As a signatory (ratifying) nation, Japan must mobilize its law enforcement (police) and judiciary to eradicate these human rights violations. During my recent visit to Japan, I discovered that in just the past two years, two additional cases of abduction and coercive faith-breaking have occurred.

One of my missions is to bring international awareness to the human rights violations against religious minorities in Japan. After my time here, I plan to travel to the United States to advocate for this issue with relevant parties.
